CHAPTER IX .- THE BROTHER AND

Four days of indescribable anxiety led passed, and Calmer, was no more the healthy, fresh looking person he was once. Thin and emaciated, he was looked upon by his friends with alarm and the most intense maxiety. No more did he mingle in the mercy circle, and join in the giddy dance; no more were the cheetful tones of his voice heard to reverberate along the gay saloon of fashionable society; but his whole soul, his every energy of mind, were all gonceptrated in the pursuit of one great and absorbing object. Carmelia was the only person that engrossed file attention, and he exerted every faculty he possessed in endeavoring to discover whither she had been taken. Searches were instituted, the country was flooded with fled. No hope now presented itself to his mind; all was a dark and fearful approached-a tiny form was bending over it. It was little Nett, and thus brother and sister stood by the grave of Carmelia's father,

Brother, what makes you look so

"How little do you know of sorrow, and the miseries of human life! But tell me, my little angel, what brought you'to this sacred place! Has a grave yard, with its solemn tombs, any charms for Nett"

"Do you see the flowers I have thrown upon the grave?". "Well, what do they mean, pretty one?"

"Pappy De Benion was always so good to little Nett, that I thought if I would cover his grave with pretty flowers his spirit would send Carmelia back to us again."

"Then does Nett care for Carmelia!"

"Moo" is, in the last "Colonist" that arrived yesterday."

Jack took the paper and spied an advertisement round which a black line had been drawn with a pen to attract attention. It read as follows: "$1000.

"The signs are a dozen to one against us," replied Jack, "so I'll just take a walk out and see if I can discover any signs of hostility. 'Straws show which way the wind blows."

A long train of men might have been seen ascending a declivity near which the house of the Miser was situated. Their panoply shone in the translu-cent rays of the sun, which was fast "To use my prisoner," continued the first speaker, approaching Dick, and the same time placing his hand up on his shoulder.
