

they had nine of, and of harness makers out here. As to building, they had to hire mechanics from the village to put them up. He gave a specimen of Collins's business habits, with regard to purchasing a wood lot up the river, and conveying it to his loggers, railroad, where the cost was not the lumber was worth when asked, besides having them in an undesirable situation—his giving his note, and refusal to pay the same—representing himself as an agent of a paper called the Star. Prior, who by which he incurred a debt of ninety-five dollars, which he drew from the Treasury, and never accounted therefor. He then treated of John's benefactor, and added two or three other of his brutal conduct to a Mrs. Valverde, his unmanly threats to her—his conduct with regard to Edward Elliby, of Philadelphia, who was threatened to be turned out of all his rights, after having obtained all that could be obtained from him, because he had expressed himself unfavorably to his measures—his abusive language to females—his conduct to himself (Rector)—how, in order to get a remuneration for his labor, he (Rector) had taken a yoke of oxen, wagon, and a few bundles of wheat, after leaving, in vain, to obtain a settlement with Collins; which wheat he sold—how Collins, a man that disbelieved in an appeal to the law, issued a writ of replevin, and arrested him (Rector) (Spoke of Dr. Dwight, and the names of those who were Collins's strenuous supporters. Also of Collins's complimentary toast in regard to the Boston Investigator—a paper which will publish nothing detrimental to his, Collins's interest.

"O. Kellogg, of Ohio, then stood up and said that he, Collins, had been with him, and received with loud signs of disapprobation, hisses, cries of 'down with Collins.' The chairman interfered, and requested Collins to sit down. Collins sat down with a countenance resembling that of a man who is about to be executed. The chairman then, after the expended veins in his forehead, that he was wrought up to the highest pitch of excitement. Kellogg then accused Rector of frequently taking community property. An enquiry from John Milton Arnold, who was Collins's community principle for each to help himself to what he wanted, called forth loud applause. Kellogg proceeded. (Hissing and great uproar.) J. A. Collins stood up. (Hissing and increased cries of 'down, down.' The chairman called on him to sit down. Kellogg said, 'This is a crisis was tremendous.' After some time the chairman obtained order, and then stated that he thought that a person who would not observe, and pay respect to the chair, ought not to have a hearing. Great cheers followed this, and the speaker, in a social reform, with yells that seemed ready to burst from mental excitement, and a countenance the most diabolical I ever saw, resumed his seat, muttering 'infamous! infamous!' After Kellogg had done, Collins stood up, and in a loud, clear, and manly voice, endeavored to substantiate his character, using honesty; attacked the character of Mr. Johnson, a leading community, now in Boston, who left some time since. This was received with every sign of disapprobation, inasmuch as Johnson was not a community principle foreign to the object of the meeting.

Rector then substantiated his former statement. Cries for Prior, Prior, G. Prior is a respectable man, for many years a resident of Philadelphia, and a friend of Collins and Watson. G. Prior, then stood up, and confirmed Rector's statement—spoke of the creed that was published, some thing over a year ago, as being got up for a particular purpose, which was to get rid of Johnson, whose illness of disaffection was enlarged in John Collins—spoke of Collins's hypocrisy.

Collins here stood up to explain. (Great confusion, hisses, &c.) A vote being taken as to whether Collins should explain or not, was carried in the affirmative—he then spoke of his former good friends and zealous coadjutors in a manner, indeed, very contemptible—of his good deeds as a peace maker—his good management as a farmer—spoke of the farm as one of extraordinary fertility, as it, according to his estimate would produce twenty acres of wheat, and was situated in a beautiful spot, and was a fine place to assist a single individual, but must extend to the mass; and therefore, he could not assist the whole world, he refrained from relieving the wants of the suffering indigent—stated that the certificate in the village paper had been issued, and that he was under the impression that the members of the community would have carried out his intentions, but that he found them intractable. He had no complaint to make but against those who opposed him in his ambitious views. Mr. Kennedy, a member, then stepped up and he believed there were many candid and honest people at Community Place, and he wished the audience to observe, that he did not consider J. A. Collins and community as synonynous—that as far as his experience was concerned, he must say that what Rector had stated of Collins was too true.

A Mr. Holmes then took the floor on Mr. Kennedy's setting down—he appears a perfect counterpart of Collins, and endeavored to convince the audience that the difference consisted in mere matters of opinion, and charged Rector with being idle, and that he considered G. Prior had stated what was not true. Prior hereupon called upon Holmes for proof.

Holmes after much deliberation and hesitancy, said he did not think that Collins had invited Prior to the Community as stated by Prior, but Prior stated that he had the letter by him, and offered at a future date to produce it, wherein the invitation was given to him by Collins. Rector charged Collins with uncommunity principles, with regard to his conduct to a man named Jackson. Collins replied that Jackson was a man with a good name, and that he did not object to Jackson as a man, still he would dispense with him to get rid of his family. Prior charged him with hypocrisy in his conduct to Mr. Johnson, inasmuch as that he heaped the most opprobrious names upon him, and then, in his hearting with him he must salute him with a kiss. This was confirmed by a lady then present, not withstanding Collins's denial. Prior also charged him with being an encourager of licentious conduct, which Collins denied, and said that he was not giving the lie to all Prior had stated.

The meeting continued from half past ten, during which it seemed as if hell had been let loose—such hissing, hissings, and yellings required a more graphic pen than mine to describe. Collins, in a general way, was giving the lie to all Prior had stated. The meeting continued from half past ten, during which it seemed as if hell had been let loose—such hissing, hissings, and yellings required a more graphic pen than mine to describe. Collins, in a general way, was giving the lie to all Prior had stated.

Much praise is due to the Chairman for his impartiality towards the speakers; and the enthusiasm with which his observations were greeted, plainly showed that the audience appreciated his efforts. The cause of the meeting appears a jealousy of too much power invested in one man—and that man John A. Collins. Johnson, who is somewhat of a lawyer, and about the most honest and industrious among them, has been a complete tool in the hands of Collins in carrying out his ambition. As a last resource, Collins got friend to buy Johnson's interest in the concern, and to give him employment in Boston at yearly salary. When Johnson got to Boston, he exposed Collins's tricks, and misled the rockers of the Community, and that in order to keep possession of the station of reform, it became necessary to have a clearance of all opponents to the one man in power; accordingly a large number left, and one man undertook to remunerate himself by taking the name of Collins, and for so doing was arrested by virtue of a writ issued in Collins's name. You know 'Collins and I need not inform you what a serpentine man he is—a perfect kaleidoscope—never catch him in a position twice alike—beautiful in theory, but unobtainable in practice.

On the following Wednesday, the 23d, another meeting was held in the same place, and the same persons presided. The charges were a recapitulation of the former statements, with statements of Collins's past keeping accounts—inasmuch as an arbitral committee held at Community Place, Collins had made no entry of property to a considerable amount to the credit of the Community, and had represented the liabilities of the association as being much greater than they were. Collins in a speech, which was endeavored to explain, and was listened to with the greatest attention. Considerable recrimination took place. From Collins's account the association were between two and three thousand dollars in debt, and according to his statement, the Community had received five hundred dollars made the Community so much better than nothing! Mr. Orris, formerly an attorney in this country, seems the most independent man at Community at present. Statements about Rector's misstatements about the Community. Collins admitted that though he had charged Rector with being idle, that he had made an advance of a considerable sum of money to him, in order to keep him there to work at Community Place, and that he had a young man from New Hampshire to state if he, the young man, did not receive the treatment due a man, and if he was not deceived with regard to Community. The young man, with care-worn countenance, declined saying any thing at present. This seemed to imply, I dare not—I am too dependent on the Community now, but the time will come when I may open my mouth. The result of the evening was this, that the citizens are clearly convinced of what they have long thought of this association—that it is an atheistical seminary, and an impure fountain—that the sentiments published to the world are not those of the men who are carried out there.

The house was crowded to excess: the greatest order was observed, for which the chairman deservedly received a vote of thanks, which was enthusiastically given. It is no easy matter to make Community folks observe the rules requisite at such meetings, as they follow the impulse of their own feelings, unobscured by common usages. The meeting continued until half past ten, and then retired in a peaceable manner.

One member accused Rector of thieving, for which he has obtained lodgings in the county jail, for a time to await the result of a trial.
